

ACADEMIC SPREE DAY 1997 REVISITED...

The 1997 Academic Spree Day was notable for many things, probably, but the thing we remember best was the exhibit unveiled by Dr. Not Steve (of an undisclosed department). Although his invitation to the event was allegedly “misplaced,” Dr. Steve’s research attracted the attention of many a Clark professor, including the highest academic official in the university. Critics were reportedly “pissed.”

One important exhibit at the 1997 Academic Spree Day was Dr. Not Steve’s “Analysis of Lucid Dreaming States in Bricks.” Although controversial, Dr. Steve’s exhibit was visited by (l to r) Dr. Christoph Hohenemser, colleague George Gilpatrick, an important community member*, Macneil “The Beard” Shonle, and Provost Roger Kasperson.

* We were never properly introduced. If you recognize this woman, please tell us who she is. Email wheatbread@clarku.edu with the low-down.

Provost Roger Kasperson, professor Christoph Hohenemser, and some hot-looking woman look on as Dr. Gilpatrick adjusts some knobs.

Part of the highly-technological set-up used for monitoring and analysis. Note the brick.

A disapproving Seymour Wapner, founder of Academic Spree Day, examines the bold presentation. Dr. Steve explains that his faculty sponsor is Professor Spigot of Neuroscience.

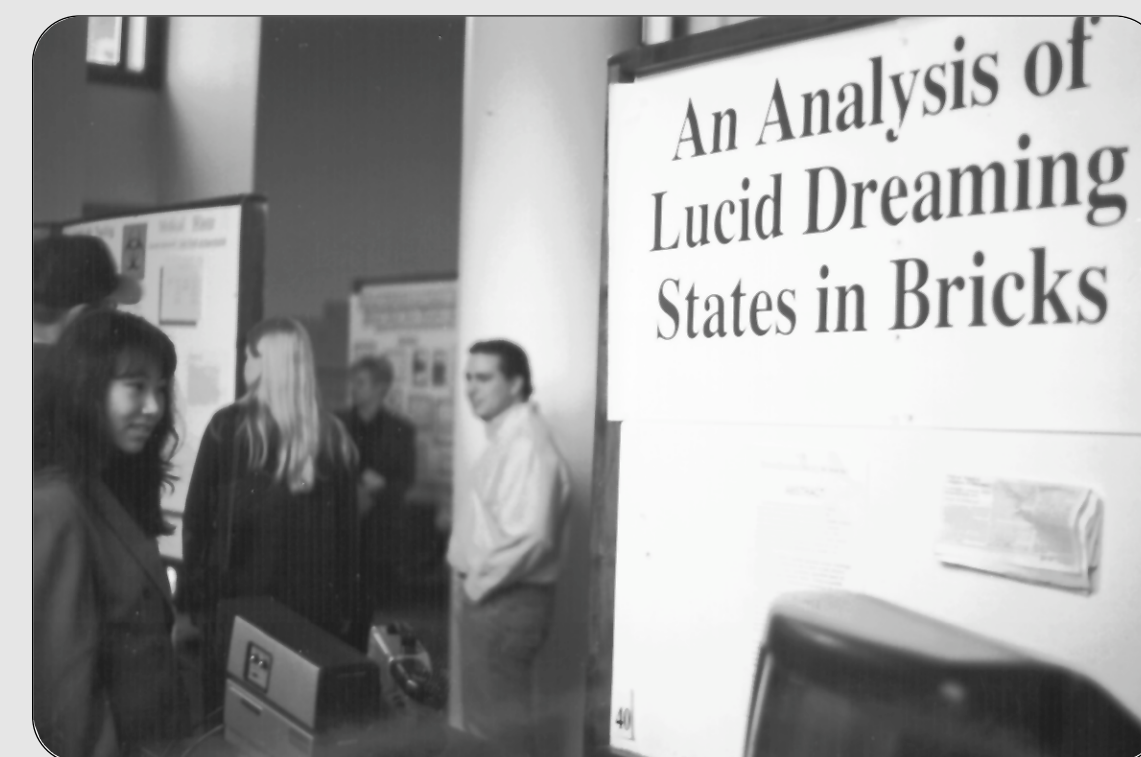

A pretentious Dr. Steve adjusts the voltage ratio on the oscilloscope. An anxious audience looks on in wonder.

Dr. Not Steve gesticulates wildly at Prof. David Joyce. Somewhere in the picture is a brick.

— Photography by Kate Fink and Randy Mack —

A bemused student (left) looks on at the exhibit (right).

Prof. Steve Guo eyes the fruits of Dr. Steve’s seven-year itch. Dr. Steve eyes Professor Guo. Meanwhile, Dr. Gilpatrick smirks at someone’s philistine attempt at scholarship.